How to let go of being a "good person" to become a "better person"?

Author: Dolly Chugh, Social Scientist

It's a mandatory true that being seen as a good person feels like a good person. But what happens when no one is interested in us anymore? What if we fail badly? What if we can't handle such truth during our downfalls. How will we stop ourselves from falling?

The author says, the attachment to "being a good person", comes in way of becoming a better person. "Being a good person" people try to unconsciously defy their mistakes with lining shreds of evidence, instead of learning from them. Mistakes and the lessons of failure are the stepping stones. But why defy them and push you away from the success waiting ahead?

The author says, the definition of "good person" is very narrow and scientifically impossible to meet. We expect it to be easy when it's not. So we falsify our characteristics for the people's sake, moral values, ethics, and why not professionalism! To make this clear, people consider "being a good person" is something like an "either-or" concept. That is, either you are a good person or the bad. This would not give space to learn and grow. The question is, when we are ready to address ourselves as a "Beginner in Python" and "Core Java Learner" before the interviewer, why can't we address ourselves as a "good-ish person", who is trying to be a good person?

I would like to end this with, "you're given one golden life", then why live for others?
